Abandoned School Sought For Use as Youth Center

NORWICH — Cortland street school, which was once bid upon at public auction and the bid rejected by the school board, may become a youth center if arrangements can be made to have the city purchase the building "at a nominal sum."

The property was bid at last May and the lone offer was $3,600. This was rejected by the school board, and a second auction date was set for Sept. 27. A "neighbor committee" of area residents propositioned the city council to take the building over at the price of $1, for use by Boy and Girl Scouts, and other youth organizations.

At a meeting of the school board it was left that the board and the city council get together and decide what should be done.

William Raynor, a member of the board has suggested that a public meeting be held to allow the taxpayers to state their wishes. If the vote is against the youth center, the school must be sold to the highest bidder. Otherwise it can be turned into a needed youth center.

It was said yesterday that both the school board and city council favor the youth center plan, but the proposed hearing may save both boards from criticism. The date for the public meeting has not been set, but is thought that it may be soon.
